Discipleship: The Expression of Saving Faith

They learn from their own and others' experiences by reviewing past organizational successes and failures, assessing them systematically, and recording them in a format that employees can easily access. Learning from the experiences and best practices of others is a major factor in the success and sizable cost savings of a number of organizations' reengineering initiatives. Although knowledge gained from failures can often be the most helpful, DeLong and Fahey, However, knowledge from these sources serves as a starting point only; organizations are expected to test and improve upon it through continual experimentation. DeLong and Fahey, Using systematic experimentation to generate new knowledge internally. Experimentation is widely recognized as a cornerstone of a learning organization.
